Martina Behm: Out Here

- A gripping, warm-hearted and wise debut, the discovery of a new narrative voice
- Martina Behm skilfully weaves together different perspectives into an impressive panorama
- For readers of Juli Zeh, Mariana Leky and Dörte Hansen

A white deer, a dark prophecy and a village turned upside down

In Fehrdorf, everybody seems to know where they belong. Only Ingo and Laura, who recently moved from the big city to this small village in the German countryside with their children, are struggling. Especially Ingo finds the commute to his start-up in Hamburg exhausting. When he hits a white deer with his car one evening, it disrupts the balance of the whole village.

Two women, one painter and a warning: »Don't model for him!«

Louis Creutz is a painter willing to transgress any boundary, because he simply refuses to acknowledge them. Anybody who comes into contact with him is exploited first and then dropped. Mostly, these people are women, his models. One of them is now homeless, a woman with golden curls and an eerie mask-like face. Meanwhile, another woman, young and full of life, throws all caution to the wind.

Martin Mosebach reaches new literary heights in this novel – a great book, powerfully vivid, full of surprises and captivatingly told.

During a moment of intimacy, a young woman asks her lover a question that sounds innocent yet contains the seeds of jealousy: What was your life like before we knew each other? His answer spirals into a web of truth and fiction, a palace of lies. The city of Frankfurt provides the fantastical stage for this ingenious piece of social theatre: Do two marriages and a family really have to fall apart for a couple to find happiness together?

A midsummer night's dream in Frankfurt

Hans considers himself lucky. He's just got married and obtained a new job in Frankfurt. He and his wife Ina move into a rather run-down flat close to the shady main station, when things start to get a little messy. One day, Ina finds a dead pigeon in the bedroom. Then, a wedding ring goes missing, their neighbours turn out to be magical, and a late-night drinking session turns into a witches' dance. Meanwhile, the complexities of the art of seduction put young love to a difficult test.

Lizzie Doron: Acting Out Everyday Life – Life In Israel

Since 7th of October

- One of the most important Israeli peace activists speaks out: what has life been like since 7th October 2023?
- When you feel alienated from your own country – an emotional insight into everyday life in a torn society at war

We might not be here tomorrow

Lizzie Doron has spent her whole life fighting for her country – for a homeland free from persecution, for peace with their Palestinian neighbours, for freedom and democracy. Then came 7th of October, destroying everything that had been before. As sirens wail and people's minds turn to the kidnapped hostages, the government wages a war that kills even more people and brings none back. How can there still be faith in a future?

At a time when there are few answers to be had, Lizzie Doron writes about everyday life, which does not exist yet carries on somehow: encounters with the bereaved, absurdly comical scenes with the grandkids in air-raid shelters, political discussions at the hair-dresser's, increasingly vapid memorials, silence on the telephone with her Palestinian friend. A moving testament from a traumatised society.

»One can only pay the highest respect to Lizzie Doron's literary and human achievements.« Jüdische Allgemeine

© Dirk Shiba, 2023

Lizzie Doron, born in 1953, made her name with novels about the experience of second-generation holocaust-survivors. With 'Who the Fuck Is Kafka' – one of the most important literary explorations of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict – and 'Sweet Occupation', she increasingly turned to political questions. Lizzie Doron has been the recipient of numerous awards. She lives in Tel Aviv and Berlin.

The war is over – can love begin?

Spring 1945, Europe lies in ruins. Anni flees the burning city of Dresden with her young daughter and the half-Jewish violinist Adam. Their journey leads them through occupied Germany to her deceased husband's family in Tyrol. There they are faced with a momentous decision: If Anni wants to stay, Adam has to go. Her twin brother Tristan has narrowly escaped death and is now in an English POW camp. Despite facing immense hostility from her fellow countrymen, the British nurse Rosalie cares for him – but their blossoming love is forbidden under the law and by Rosalie's own family.

Sarah Höfllich has written a gripping family novel about four young people, who are forced to confront the painful fact that love doesn't heal all wounds but just some.

Loss, grief and moving on: three women in a fishing village in Maine

Holidays on the coast of Maine are among Mina's most treasured childhood memories. Until that fateful summer, after which she and her parents never visited again. Many years later, after a terrible loss, Mina finds herself returning once more. She ends up in a lobster fishing village with 72-year-old Ann, who lives in a house on the water and approaches everything and everyone with the same harshness – except for her blue lobster, Mr Darcy, who she keeps in an aquarium in the living room. She takes Mina out to sea, where she and 54-year-old Julie teach her how to fish. Julie lost her memory in a serious accident and can now only truly be herself at sea. Meanwhile, Mina meets Sam. Sam, who never left her side during these summer holidays long ago, and whose family has never been the same since her last visit.

Two strangers. One summer journey. And suddenly, everything has changed ...

When Romy and Valentin first meet at an art auction, they appear to have little in common apart from their admiration for an old Italian painting. Yet when Romy emerges onto the street the next morning after a huge fight with her fiancé, she almost runs straight into Valentin's car – and simply gets in. Valentin has bought the painting for a client and is now supposed to deliver it to Rimini. That's how a unique and adventurous road trip starts, leading the two of them much further south than planned. And as the air begins to smell of thyme and pine trees, they grow closer. But Romy still has a fiancé waiting for her. And what secret is Valentin hiding?

A bridge for eternity

London, 1749: newly widowed clothier Juliana Hamley has to fight tooth and nail to keep her shop open on London Bridge. Business is bad, she's up to her ears in debt, and the construction of a new bridge across the river Thames threatens the existence of all the other established shops as well. Desperate, she enters into the smuggling business, ably assisted by the crafty street urchin Alder. But danger lurks everywhere, and even London Bridge itself is hiding a dark secret. The bridge's former chapel, where Juliana's shop is located, is at the very centre of a centuries-old prophecy that presages the bridge's downfall ...

- A remote village in the mountains, and an uncanny creature which roams the forested peaks at night
- A historical and gripping thriller told from multiple perspectives, with dramatic and surprising twists and turns
- A hulking gamekeeper with a violent past and a trusting refugee boy—an unlikely yet powerful duo

A gamekeeper and a refugee boy on the trail of a myth

A mountain region in the southern part of Germany, 1630: the young boy Johann and his Calvinist family are trying to build a new life for themselves in a remote village, which is strangely empty of children. Johann is wondering what happened. Who or what killed two of the children, and where did all the others disappear to? Was it the 'Wild Hunter', a legendary wolfman, who is said to be roaming the densely forested mountains? At the same time, the taciturn gamekeeper Hildner arrives, a rough ex-mercenary sent by the margrave to bring peace to the area. When Johann glimpses the Wild Hunter with his own eyes, the gamekeeper and the boy are thrown together. They set off on the trail of the nebulous beast, finding themselves face to face with unknown horrors.

Peter Grandl: Reset – The Truth Dies Last

- Grippingly topical – for readers of Marc Elsberg and Marc-Uwe Kling
- Grandl’s suspenseful thriller explores the potential dangers of digital communication, and what action we can take against them?
- Meticulously researched in cooperation with international experts

Who can you trust when everything is fake?

In October 2024, US forces declare the highest security level: A passenger plane apparently hijacked by terrorists is about to be shot down in Munich, and the volume of fake news is increasingly dramatically across the globe. Calls and video messages are so convincingly faked that nobody knows whether they’re really talking to a person they know anymore. Superintendent Valentine O’Brien is investigating in Germany, when the digital networks go down and suddenly no connection is secure anymore. While O’Brien sets out on a dangerous journey across Europe in search of his missing sister, chaos breaks out worldwide – and humanity finds itself on the brink of its darkest hour.

The author conducted research in several countries for 'Reset', working with dozens of experts, including the AI advisor to the German government and fighter pilots in the German air force.

An island on the hunt for a murderer

Nicole Stappenbek is reluctant to organise a reunion with her former youth group on the island of Amrum, where they last got together in autumn 1998. Nicole didn't really like the participants back then, but she's curious to see what's become of them.

However, any pleasure she gets from seeing them again is abruptly squashed when one guy is found dead hanging upside-down in the resort toilets.

Inspector Stappenbek immediately orders her colleague Thies Detlefsen to come to the island to investigate the case. When another participant goes missing, the island descends into fear. All the clues are pointing back into the past, to that autumn nearly 27 years ago. And Nicole is starting to feel uneasy ...

Sylt's most charming estate agent is back on a case!

On the ferry from Denmark to Sylt, Sylt-based estate agent Kristan Dennermann makes the acquaintance with a knowledgeable wax dealer and candle-maker on her way to a sabbatical on the island. Back on Sylt, he is to sell an antiques shop in an old Frisian-style house in Keitum, when he finds the body of the former shop owner in the storage room. What does the murder have to do with the mysterious candle-maker Kristan keeps meeting on the island? His investigation draws him into a world of secrets and deception, and he discovers places and aspects of his beloved island he has never seen before.

Travel stories for advanced practitioners

The pandemic may have slowed him down, but now Dietmar Bittrich is back on the road – by bus, train, plane, rental car and on foot. Writing with incomparably dry wit, an instinct for situational comedy and an affectionately ironic eye for human shortcomings, he explores the ups and downs and occasionally pointless absurdities of travel. Do we really need to find out what's hiding behind such mythical names as Palenque and Timbuktu? Perhaps a stroll through a humdrum but as-yet undiscovered small town will suffice. But when you reach the main square you stop, startled: haven't we been here before?

Dietmar Bittrich lives in Hamburg and has written several best-sellers, notably 'The Jelly-Baby Oracle'. His previous books published by dtv include: 'Appalling Adages for Everyday Use', 'Monstrous Maxims for Men and Women', and 'How to Complicate Life for Yourself and Those Around You'.

Which life and love decisions promise lasting happiness?

One morning, Toni doesn't wake up as usual in her small apartment in an old building next to her long-term boyfriend. No: To her amazement, she finds herself in a generously proportioned residence. Everything is bright, tidy and expensively furnished. And the view from the window? Strangely familiar. Antonia realises: she is back in the village of her childhood.

Little by little, she realises that she is leading a quiet life here, with a car in front of the door, a mother-in-law next door and a child on her lap. A child on her lap? Antonia is amazed. Is that her baby? And the father? Apparently her first great love – a man she could never quite forget.

Titanic on the rails

Berlin, 1922. The train station Anhalter Bahnhof is one of the city's most magnificent and promising buildings. Every day, thousands of people travel from here to destinations all over the world: people in search of a new home, people in search of great fortune.

This is also the case for the passengers boarding the night train to Paris that evening: a fake baron, an industrialist on the run, a housekeeper with wanderlust, a heroic conductor, a secret couple and a thief. For all of them, the journey on the Grand Express will be a fateful one, at the end of which nothing will be the same again.
